taken from a stele discovered a few months ago by the French expedition that has been for years engaged in archaeological researches in Susa, the ancient capital of Persia, under the direction of Professor de Morgan. The inscription was found on a diorite block, 2.25 meters in height, taken from the old royal castle in Susa.

This stele contains, according to the New York Sun, besides a picture illustrating how King Hammurabi received these laws from the sun god, a complete legal code of 282 separate laws, of which, however, Nos. 66 to 99 have been chiseled out. complete legal code of 282 separate laws, of which, however, Nos. 66 to 99 have been chiseled out. This gap is in part remedied by fragments found in the great library of Assurbanipal.

There are sixteen columns of inscription found on the front of the stome beneath the picture of Hammurabi and twenty-eight on the rear.

A special introduction and concluding admonition to future generations to observe faithfully the requirements of this code indicate that the laws contained in it were made by Hammurabi, the contemporary of Abraham, the Amraphal of the scriptures, and that this is the oldest corpus juris extant, antedating even the days of Moses by half a thousand years and more, the date of Hammurabi being about 2,300 B. C.

That a Babylonian inscription of this sort should be found in the Persian capital is readily evaluanced by the feet that:

141. If anybody breaks a hole into a house he shall be killed in front of this hole and shall be burned there.

28. If anybody has a debt to pay, and a storn destroys his land, or the harvest is wrecked, or there has been a lack of water, then he is not obliged to pay the owner any grain for this year, nor shall be be compelled to pay interest.

C. That a Babylonian inscription of this sort should be found in the Persian capital is readily explained by the fact that it was brought to Susa as booty by the Elamite kings, and it is not the only specimen of the kind here found, the transfer being made probably in the seventeenth or skrienth century. The discovery only confirms what was indicated by the Tel-el-Amara finds in Egypt dating from the fourteenth century, which are also in cuneiform writing, namely, that this was at that early perlod the common language of diplomacy and international and business communication.

Near Journey's End.

As an instance of clever repartee, this which we find in the Boston Pilot is hard to beat. A distinguished lawyer and politician was traveling on a train when an irishwoman came into the car with a basket, bundle, etc. She paid her fare, but the conductor passed by the lawyer without collecting anything. The good woman thereupon said to the lawyer. "An' faith an' why is it that the conductor takes the money of a poor woman an' don't ask ye, who seem to be a rich man, for anything?" The lawyer, who had a pass, replied: "My dear madam, I'm traveling on my beauty." The woman looked at him for a moment and then quickly answered: "An' is that so? Then ye must be very near yer juorney's end."

Mr. Sheedy is frank. He is also world's financial centers far greater than the production of the state practically incorporates the entire county of Bucks. Rothschild is a name with which to conjure riches. It has been the talisman of wealth for nearly a century. It has exercised an influence in the world's financial centers far greater than that of political kings and po-ment of a firm known as the Oppensequently forfeited in a manner that constitutes a license to continue gambling.

Another thing about Sheedy's talk that should be of interest is his statement that he has practically nothing to show for his years of "hard work" and lost sleep. Sheedy is considered a successful gambler, but the chances are that if he had his life to live all over again he would engage in some homest vocation, some work in which made was when he became financial agent of the Landgrave of Hesse. This gave him large sums of money to manipulate. He took such good advantage of his opportunities that in 1894 he was enabled to lend a large sum to the Danish government. From that time he began to be recognized to official news of the English victory ar-
